THE FOURTH REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION

The present revision consists of over 900 new titles. Three hundred of the older titles were omitted, not because they were no longer useful, but in order to make room for the newer material.

A new section, "Islands of the seas" has been added to the Appendix. These small land areas have become of increasing importance because of their geographic location, political influence, and economic possibilities. The larger islands, and continents that play a world role were not included in this section.

Added also, were two sections of World War II, and after. These will be found in their chronological order.

For different reasons compiling this work has presented problems. A few might be mentioned:

(a) The period covered by this revision coincided with the world conflict. Few books on various periods, and phases of history were published, e.g., Ancient history; World War I. This had its effect on the proportion of material in the list.

(b) The book output was marked by a change of format in many books. The binding, margins, paper, and print was not up to pre-war standards. This has a bearing on the life of the physical book, and its possible rebinding.

(c) The language in some of the books was frank, and in other cases crude. In each such case the book had to be judged in the light of present-day usage.

(d) Many books in the field of biography, and travel consisted of an imaginative reconstruction based on varying degrees of fact. In this, they resembled historical fiction, and were classified as stories.

This revision is based on the original pamphlet sponsored by the National Council for Social Studies, plus the later revisions.

The Compiler is indebted to many Public, and School libraries for the opportunity of examining most of the titles in this list.

INTRODUCTION

EXTENSIVE READING IN HISTORY

At the present time, all progressive schools recognize the value of extensive reading in connection with courses in the curriculum, not only for the immediate value to the pupil, but as an experience that is likely to be carried over into adult life as a leisure occupation. In no field is there a richer or more varied body of material available than in the field of history. It is to suggest the possibilities in such reading at the junior and senior high school level that this selected, annotated list has been compiled. Although it is designed to assist history teachers in pupil guidance in extensive reading, and for the use of public and school librarians as an aid in directing the reading of children, it may also be helpful to teachers of English, Latin, and modern languages. To teachers of English it will suggest titles that will enrich the reading experience of adolescent youth. For the Latin teacher, the list will provide well-graded background material. Teachers of modern languages will find in the list books that will stimulate interest in the historical and cultural background of the country whose language they are teaching. Since the list is designed particularly for the field of history, the discussion will deal with the use of the material suitable for teachers in that field.

In history teaching supplementary reading has been a part of classroom procedure for a long time, and reference reading has been well organized and directed. But it is only recently that the value of wide and free reading from the field of fiction, and from interesting popular historical literature has been recognized. It is a short-sighted policy to give pupils history training for the present alone, a training that results in lesson learning in order to meet classroom requirements. It is true that we cannot enjoy to the full what we do not understand, and no one would suggest that the teaching of history should dispense with giving pupils accuracy of thought and fact. But this skeleton of fact must be made alive by the interesting things that have happened as man traveled down the ages. Both the skeleton and the rounded contours of the muscles are needed to make history alive and vital. The proportion of the formulated historical matter to the imaginative and dramatic details might well be a matter of difference of opinion and one best left to the discretion of the individual teacher. Once the importance of a body of well-rounded historical experience for the pupils is taken for granted, the proportion of different kinds of material can be determined according to their needs.

Historical material of the kind used in the classroom is both plentiful and well standardized. Supplementary reading material, too, has received much study and attention from teachers in the social science field. There is a type of material, however—fiction, biography, general accounts, specialized period accounts—that has been less frequently used and is less widely known. This imaginative and popular history material is what I mean by the rounded contour on the history frame; it is the kind of reading pupils will enjoy and which is likely to make them history minded.

At this point the following questions may be raised: Why use the historical novel at all in a history course? Why not use material which is strictly historical? These questions suggest the attitude of the trained historian, of the historical teacher who is dealing with advanced students. The educator and the psychologist will answer that these objections do not hold for the immature mind, for the developing boy and girl of the adolescent age. The child has not formed canons of probability. He views all with open mind and sees with the eye of wonder. This attitude it is wise to cherish, and to guide wisely, for sophistication will proceed rapidly enough. If the imagination of the child has been fed on folklore and the stories of the heroes and the great epical narratives, he will not need any introduction to history. The child less fortunately placed will find the sense of reality in the past through the reading of the great chroniclers and romancers. For him Herodotus and Scott are alike friends and guides, portals to the realm of romance which for him is the realm of history. Thus the race story may lose the alien quality which it possesses for some, and may come to be "my story," in the consciousness of the student.

"For many students the facts of the past as they are gathered from textbooks remain abstract, dry and lifeless. Unless the student comes to visualize the past, unless it comes to have reality in his mind, the lessons which history teaches are largely lost to him. The skillful teacher or the student gifted with imagination may not need any aids, and for these the devices of method and material are not so necessary. But with the average teacher in the average school, there can be little doubt that the historical novel may become a great aid to the effective teaching of history. The hard-worked teacher, who has not the time to build up a technique of illustration, will find helpers in the masters of imaginative fiction. These writers, by giving background and atmosphere to the facts of history, may contribute to the work of the teacher. While from the individual standpoint, this type of reading does not appeal to some, there are others for whom it becomes a gateway to historical interests and historical knowledge."

Fiction, as we have seen, has its emotional and imaginative appeal. There is another type of book that is popular and can contribute to the historical outlook of the pupil. Next to fiction, at the present time, biography is the most widely read and enjoyed by all types of readers.

Carlyle would have it that "History is the essence of innumerable biographies." We might not altogether agree with this and yet recognize the part which dominant characters have played in history. Indeed, it would be impossible to give the spirit of any age without examining the motives and reactions of certain men and women who have made their influence felt.

Never before have there been so many biographies written in an interesting manner, and at no time have these books been so attractive in print and binding. The appeal of such material to adolescent pupils is assured because at heart they are hero worshippers, and, moreover, they also enjoy the keen, sparkling style of the new type of biographies that attempt to evaluate historical characters as human beings.

Another large class of books, general narratives and specialized period material, is valuable because it makes real and vivid smaller sections of historical accounts. Pupils get a highly concentrated idea of the whole stream of history from their textbooks, but they need interesting details in order to reconstruct the life and times of an age other than their own. They cannot assimilate material boiled down to encyclopedic length, because it gives too little detail and is therefore lifeless.

Hence this list is an attempt to furnish suggestions for both fiction and factual material for pupils in the junior and senior high schools. It is selected from a wide range of material and fitted into an outline that follows logical teaching units, and, therefore, may be used in connection with any textbook.

All book lists have sins of omission and commission and it is certain that this list includes titles that some teachers will think might better have been left out, and it leaves out those that might well have been included. Perhaps stating the problems involved in compiling the list will clarify the matter and prove helpful.

(1) Material available: As a general premise, it must be stated that the compiler of a list can only choose from the material available. We would wish for better and more attractive books for certain periods, but since they are not published they cannot be included.

(2) Proportion: Certain phases of history have attracted creative writers, and, consequently, they have been productive of a wealth of material, while for other periods there is a comparative dearth. In order that the list as a whole be properly balanced, material will sometimes have to be excluded where there is a wealth of riches while almost all the material in certain periods will have to be included.

(3) Readability: The list is compiled with a definite reading group in mind. In order to interest this group, the stories selected must provide enjoyment as well as a body of plausible historical background. Moreover, the factual material must hold the interest of boys and girls as well as challenge their intellectual curiosity.

(4) Range of social maturity: Pupils in the junior and senior high schools may range from ten to twenty years old. This age span makes for varying degrees of social maturity and consequently a wide diversity of interests.

(5) Range of reading ability: Although it is generally supposed that when a pupil reaches junior high school he knows how to read and comprehend material of average difficulty, studies of reading abilities prove that there are many pupils in the high school who do not read as well as some pupils in the upper grades of the elementary school. Yet many high school pupils have the reading ability of educated adults. Therefore, provision has been made for all degrees of reading ability.

(6) Copyright date: All other things being equal, the book with the latest copyright date is selected, for two reasons:

(a) Pupils enjoy the style of writing, and the physical make-up of recent books.

(b) It is more likely that books with a recent copyright date are "in print."

(7) Historical information: Few historical novels can be measured with an historian's measuring stick for absolute accuracy. Most historical fiction consists of the following:

- (a) Real and fictitious characters.
- (b) Real and imagined episodes and incidents.
- (c) Real and imaginary background and setting.

All variations and combinations of these are used by authors.

(8) Historical authority: In cases where there are differences of opinion in regard to historical truths, e.g., Whitman's influence in preventing the cession to England of the American claim to Oregon, no attempt has been made to give examples illustrating the various opinions. On the other hand, for the many historical controversies that present the problem of two sides, e.g., the Civil War, fiction presenting both sides is included.

(9) Literary quality: Outstanding literary masterpieces in the field of historical fiction are few, but there are many that come up to an acceptable standard of writing. Poorly written books are excluded, even though the historical data be accurate.

(10) Length of list: In order to keep the list within reasonable limits of length, only a few of the titles from the pens of very prolific writers could be included, e.g., Altschuler, Sabatini.

(11) Dates: The dates given for the stories are approximate, and merely serve to place them in their chronological order in the outline.

(12) General accounts: Little material of a general nature is included, except when such material gives the background of a single outstanding movement or event. Accounts too general to be localized in any one unit are also omitted.

(13) Usability: As previously stated, the list is primarily compiled for teachers of history. Therefore, the organization follows a chronological order under units generally treated in progressive history textbooks.

The titles are arranged alphabetically under two headings:

- (1) Stories.
- (2) Biography, Narrative, Topical Account.

This subdivision is for the purpose of making clear the difference between the two types of books—the first is imaginative; the second, factual.

(14) Interrelationship of history: Because history deals with a record of contacts between peoples, it is not always certain where a book should be placed in the outline, e.g., books relating to the rivalry of France and England in America might well be placed both in European and in United States history.

History is a continuous process; therefore, it is impossible to partition it into air-tight compartments of dates. There is scarcely a book that does not hark back to the past nor look forward into the future. Therefore, books can only be placed approximately in any unit limited by dates.

How to use the wide-interest book given in this list so that the pupils may get the maximum of pleasure and profit from their reading presents a problem that can only be solved by the individual teacher.

In some form or other, there should be a method of checking up on the wide or free reading done in connection with a course. Mr. A. F. Barnard, a history teacher of many years of successful experience in guiding the reading of historical fiction, has this to say of his procedure:

The requirement of a report is apt to make for more attentive reading, and reading with a purpose. Moreover, the significance of the reading begins to dawn on the reader as he continues to read and to make his reports. The personal contribution of the reader to the class work may be emphasized by reading aloud to the class the best of these reports, or reports on unusual books or on those outside the lists. It may be advisable at times to post the list of best readers with the amounts read, and some example of the reports written.

It is the practice by class discussion to correlate this reading informally with the regular class work. At frequent intervals, the teacher starts the recitation with a random question as to books read, or with a leading question in regard to some particular book. This may lead to a valuable ten-minute discussion of the picture of the tournament in "Ivanhoe," or of the conference between Richard and Saladin in the "Talisman." Familiarity with the literature is of great value to the teacher in leading the discussion, and such familiarity will rapidly increase by practice, in the case of the wide-awake teacher.

These discussions may be used as an educational influence in broadening the outlook of the students. They also furnish an agency in teaching historical mindedness; as the relations of fact and fancy are sure to come to the front. The thoughtful teacher will use them to call the attention of the class to the importance of making distinctions between what is true and what may be imagined to have taken place under actual conditions.

It may be noted in passing that this material should not be confused with the text and reference books, but should be placed in a position where it may stand on its own feet, in a corner of the library room and on shelves away from the reference shelves, which are associated in the mind of the student with the getting of lessons. Here, possibly with the guidance list at hand, it may be allowed to shift for itself, with the conviction that the students in search of recreation will find their way to these shelves and to an acquaintance with their riches.

Moreover, it is not the practice to introduce this material into the classroom recitation or to confuse the realms of fact and imagination. In the recitation, the chief objective is to represent the event as it actually occurred, in its circumstantial aspect, and with all the earmarks of reality. In this way history may at times introduce the child somewhat roughly to the facts, and he is apt to find instruction in knocking against the sharp corners of the world of reality, as it is seen reflected in history. By this procedure he becomes conscious in the most salutary way, that history is not a pleasant excursion, but a struggle or contest involving all the powers of the actors. Thus the natural and wholesome romantic tendencies of youth may be cultivated by the reading of the masterpieces of imaginative fiction, and corrected wherever guidance is necessary by the procedure in the classroom.

There are in addition many devices for motivating extensive factual reading and making it the means of increasing the apperceptive mass of the pupils. It might be well to mention a few of the most easily administered devices.

(1) A round table discussion of the extensive reading with a view to linking it up with classroom work.

(2) By means of posters and maps displayed in the classroom and in the school library, pupils advertise the books they have enjoyed, thus interesting other pupils in their choice.

(3) A section in the school paper may be utilized in giving short reviews of outstanding books. This will give pupils an opportunity to formulate individual reactions.

(4) An annotated catalogue made by the pupils of an entire class will result in a body of valuable material for future reference.

(5) Making a multiple choice test for each book read is both an interesting and thought-provoking device.

(6) Making an historical "Who's Who" of the biographies read by the pupils is valuable.

(7) A chronological chart, fitting the wide reading into the skeleton of historical fact will teach the continuity of history.

(8) Using a large map to show the geographical background of the stories and factual material gives a sense of geographic and historical relationships.

(9) Using current material from newspapers and magazines to supplement extra outside reading, with a view to correlating both to the topic they are studying, is to enrich the classroom teaching.

(10) Objects of art, e.g., models, curious implements, clippings from old newspapers, and objects with a historical association, used as illustrative material in the classroom or in the school library, will make the past real and vital.

(11) Formal book reports in some form or other are the most easily administered device. Pupils are apt to dislike this form of accounting and therefore its use is not advised. It is possible to devise a report sheet that is informal and yet searching, and one that can be used for both fiction and factual material. The following suggested outline may prove helpful:

Describe the book briefly. If you liked it, try to interest other pupils in it. If you did not find it worth while, tell your reason why.

There are two vital considerations in the use of extensive reading: first, how to obtain the relatively large number of books essential because a wide range of material is needed, and, second, how to administer the collection of books once it is obtained.

The books may be readily obtained from two sources, the public, and the school library. A majority of the titles on this list are to be found in the average library. Moreover, the selection of titles in this list is so wide, that even though only a portion is available, a workable collection is assured.

Teachers might request that their public library reserve a special shelf for the historical material, the books to be changed from time to time as the units of study progress.

In schools with a school library, a close contact between library and classroom is possible. There, too, a special shelf with a changing book collection is practical. In addition to making the books readily available, there is an opportunity for the teacher and the librarian to work out together interesting devices for making the wide reading popular and profitable. Thus the pupil will be guided in a manner calculated not only to contribute to his love and knowledge of history in the immediate present, but at the same time to lay a foundation of standards for his reading as an adult.
